Medical examinations at work are performed for various reasons: To determine if a person can be considered physically fit enough to be able to perform duties in a safe and healthy manner. To determine if a person is suffering from illness or disability as a consequence of work. Because (international) rules and regulations oblige a worker to undergo periodical medical examinations. Because the employer wants to provide safe and healthy working conditions and therefore offers employees regular, overall health checks. Pre-employment medical exam This is to determine if a person is medically fit enough to perform duties. This means that the content of this examination will vary with the different duties a worker needs to perform. The object is to determine if a workers health might endanger his own health and/or safety, or that of others, while performing tasks (i.e. an electrician needs to be able to distinguish red from green wires and may therefore not be colorblind, and when the electrician needs to climb ladders while performing duties, his cardiovascular heath needs to be good enough to be able to do so safely and will need to pass a cardiac stress test). Recurring Job Related Medical Examination This is a repeated pre-employment examination. Based upon the medical requirements needed to be able to safely perform duties, the employee will be tested repeatedly throughout his career, to determine whether or not he is still considered to be fit for duty. Depending on job duties and physical demands, this examination may have to be repeated once every year or even up to once every 5 years. Periodical Work Related Medical Examination This examination usually starts with a Risk Assessment (Ned.: Risico Inventarisatie & Evaluatie - RI&E) for your company as a whole, during which possible safety risks or possible risks for occurring occupational diseases or other health risks for the employee are charted. The Periodical Work Related Medical Examination is set up to detect early onset or presence of the occupational diseases or other health issues as brought forth by the Risk Assessment. This type of examination needs to be repeated regularly. Example: if workers have to work under circumstances with loud machinery nearby, they should get an ear/hearing check-up on a yearly basis. Medical Examinations mandated by law For certain types of industry or certain professions the medical examinations are determined by law (i.e. Police, Firefighter, Aviation, Maritime industry). In this case the content as well as the point of evaluation (when is a person to be considered fit for duty) are laid down in clear regulations and guidelines. Sometimes a specific level of certification is required for the examining physician (i.e. Certified Aviation Medical Examiner). Preventive Medical Examination In order to comply with the obligation to provide a safe and healthy work environment, the employer may offer his employees to participate in a Preventive Medical Examination, which is a complete and general survey of a person's overall physical and mental health. Purpose of this PME is to detect possible health threats at an early stage. This examination is not function related and also encompasses health issues that are not directly related to a person's job or duties. Items like lifestyle, psychological wellbeing and general physical fitness are included in the PME. Interested in more information about our medical examinations or would you like a quotation? However, before your first day, your employer might want you to have a pre-employment physical. After a lengthy interview process, this can feel like one more hoop to jump through. Still, for many roles, it's critical to ensure that you are physically and mentally healthy enough to fulfill your new responsibilities and reduce your risk of work-related injuries. Some careers, like police, firefighters, and commercial drivers, are required by law to have pre-employment physicals. Here at American River Urgent Care in Orangevale, California, our team provides pre-employment physicals, completing and required testing and paperwork provided by your employer. We're excited to help you take the next step in your career. How to prepare Reading this blog is an excellent first step to prepare. You should also read any pre-employment paperwork to collect as much information as possible about your new employer's expectations. You can't change your health overnight, but you can take a few steps to prepare. For example, if your employer screens for drug use, stop using any recreational drugs. While recreational marijuana is legal in California, employers can still screen for drug use. If you need to have any lab work, check if you need to avoid eating or drinking for a few hours before your appointment. What to bring You should also make sure you have all of the documentation and information we need to complete your pre-employment physical. For example, you might need to bring: Paperwork provided by your employer, if applicable A valid driver's license or other ID Any glasses, hearing aids, or other assistive devices List of current medications Information about past surgeries Immunization history List of medical conditions and allergies Your pre-employment physical paperwork should include any other documents you need to provide at the time of your exam. What to expect during a pre-employment physical New-hire physicals vary depending on the requirements of your employer. For example, some companies require stamina and physical ability testing or psychological screening along with standard testing. You can expect many of the same tests and screenings that you would have at your annual physical exam. Our team checks your blood pressure, temperature, and heart rate. They listen to your heart and lungs and feel your abdomen for signs of disease or other abnormalities. Depending on the requirements of your employer we also offer: Blood and urine tests Tuberculosis testing Titers (immunity tests for Varicella and Hepatitis B) Vaccinations, including tetanus and flu shots Vision test Covid-19 Antibody Testing If you need a pre-employment physical, contact us to schedule your appointment today. You can call our practice or book online. Who Gets Tetanus? Tetanus is a rare disease thanks to the widespread administration of an effective vaccine.
